it, your problem will be solved. Good Luck Q: Java: keep close connection between threads Maybe I'm just thinking too much, but I have a problem with my software. For context, I'm writing a simple web server in Java. When I want to send a response, my code picks the current session id and the session id from the current request. When I want to send a response, my code sends a new request to another server (not on the same server). The problem is that since I want the current session id when I receive the current request, I need to make sure there's a connection between the request and the response. So the question is: how can I manage a connection between these two requests? Every example I've found is about threads, but I can't find a way to have a "keep close" connection between two requests. Should I create a thread that checks every N ms if there's a new request/response? Or should I use some sort of multiplexing mechanism? A: If I understand your question right: You want to create a connection from your server to a web-browser, and as soon as a new request appears on the browser, you want to send it a response on the server without the need of creating a new connection? If so, you should read about the Comet approach. Create an invisible http connection that connects to your browser, and just keep sending the same message periodically from the server back to the browser.

Here's an example in Java:
